Teaser	A disposition of property upon death, e.g. a will, is deposited with the local court during one's lifetime and kept there so that it can be found in the event of death.
Volltext	If you want to ensure that your testamentary disposition (e.g. your handwritten will) is found and opened in the event of inheritance, you can place it in special official custody. Special official custody at the court also protects your will from forgery or loss. The deposit of a will is also recorded in the Central Register of Wills.

hand, it is a privately written will, the testator must take action himself.

- In this way, the testamentary disposition can be found quickly in the event of death.
- Deposition also protects against forgery and loss.
- The testator receives a certificate of deposit for this purpose.
- The disposition of death is kept in a safe at the local court.
- A custody record is kept of the dispositions of death that are in special official custody.
- A report is also made in the Central Register of Wills. This ensures that the competent probate court learns of the existence of the disposition of property upon death in a timely manner and that it can be taken into account there.
