Teaser	If you are a hunter and hunt wild boar or badgers and these are to be used as food or sold to others, you must have a Trichinella test carried out by the competent authority. In addition to wild boar and badgers, other carnivorous wild animals such as raccoons are also subject to Trichinella testing.
Volltext	If you are a hunter and kill wild boar and badgers, you must have the animals officially tested for trichinae before eating them. Trichinae are small threadworms that can settle as parasites in the muscles of mammals. Wild boar and badgers in particular can be carriers. The consumption of game meat contaminated with Trichinella can cause serious illness in humans. Safety for consumers is guaranteed by testing. Only after testing and a negative result may you use the game meat as food or sell it to others. If you sell the game to a retailer or hunter, the obligation to register for testing for trichinae is transferred to them. If you have detected any characteristics before or after killing the game that make the meat of the animal appear to be unsafe for human consumption, you must pass this information
