Volltext	If a guardian has to be appointed for a minor child, the court must appoint a guardian ad litem if this is necessary to protect the child's interests in the court proceedings. The guardian ad litem must determine the interests of the child and assert them in the court proceedings. Note: The guardian ad litem does not have any legal powers to legally represent the child. If the child is adequately represented by a lawyer or another suitable legal representative, a guardian ad litem is not necessary. The guardian ad litem is selected by the family court. The law does not stipulate any specific qualifications. Depending on the circumstances of the case, child psychologists, social pedagogues or lawyers may be considered, as well as close persons (relatives) with whom the child has particular trust. The guardianship ends with the appointment of a guardian.
