Sachverhalt

- 1st to 6th week: compensation in the amount of the full loss of earnings (net) and
- from the 7th week: compensation amounting to 67% of the loss of earnings incurred (net).

The employer is also obliged to finance the compensation payment from the state in advance. This legal obligation on the part of the employer ensures that those affected continue to receive their money despite the separation.

In the case of self-employed persons, the calculation is based on 1/12 of the earned income (§ 15 Social Security Code IV); in the case of homeworkers, the monthly average of the last year's income applies.

Employees are obliged to inform their employer or employer immediately that they are prohibited from working. As a salaried employee, you will receive the loss of earnings from your employer for the first 6 weeks in the event of a ban on work or isolation in accordance with the Infection Protection Act. An informal application must be submitted to the responsible government for compensation if you are prohibited from working for more than 6 weeks.

The responsible government will reimburse employers for the compensation paid to their employees who are to be granted compensation in accordance with Section 56 (1) IfSG (in the case of activity bans: Loss of earnings and pension contributions; in the case of separated persons: loss of earnings, pension contributions and contributions to statutory health insurance and social long-term care insurance).

Self-employed persons apply for compensation directly to the responsible government.

The application for loss of earnings compensation in accordance with Section 56 (1) IfSG for isolations and activity bans must be submitted online.
