Teaser	If your project, which does not require a procedure or approval, contradicts other building regulations, you can apply for a deviation.
Volltext	Other building regulation law" refers to building regulation law with the exception of local building regulations. The reason for this distinction is the different responsibilities. Under certain conditions, you can apply for a deviation from other building regulations for your project. A deviation from other building regulations is usually dealt with together with a building application. However, a deviation from other building regulations can also be applied for for projects that do not require a procedure or approval. In this case, an isolated decision on the deviation is issued. Even if a deviation from other building regulations is approved for your project, it must still comply with the remaining public law requirements. The deviation from other building regulations is an intended discretionary decision. If the requirements for the deviation are met, it is usually granted, but it can also be refused in special cases.
